church, 550 Seventh avenue, was not an unqualified success, so far as the inculcating process was concerned.

The seriousness of the meeting was greatly marred by the presence of several gentlemen who evidently came for the express purpose of making Dr. Rainsford's life miserable.

There was an individual with a "jag," which was so apparent that there was no need of the repeated declarations of its owner that he had it with him. But that didn't prevent the gentleman from informing the reverend doctor at intervals that the "jag," was still there, and that the doctor was logical in his remarks concerning the church saloon.

A red-nosed man, who violently contradicated the insinuation that his olfactory organ was vermillon-hued, was another disturbing element of the meeting.

After an hour and a half of discussion, which revealed the fact that all the speakers were at odds with Dr. Rainsford's theory of downing the demon, drink, the meeting broke up.

In dismissing the audience Dr. Rainsford said he was glad he had learned the feeling which existed regarding his scheme, as it showed him more clearly how to work.
